I was walking upstream in wetlands in a brook somewhere up north. Cold water rushed from the lake downstream through the woods. I came across little island worlds in the brook—grasses, covered in plants, fed by fresh water. Graveled rocks of trees intertwined with rocks and mosses to create a landscape like the those enticing commercials for action figures in the 80s (but I digress).

A stand of wild plants grew in spots where the sun broke through the canopy.

You are in the cold north but smell distant Mediterranean citrus. Unexpected exotic beauty in the North by Lake Superior.

I found wild bergamot—blue birds—the stuff called Orange that the two parties (the CEO and me) the current drink in defiance of Britain's tea. A member of the rose tree, but looks smells of distant bergamot with a fuzzy green single wing.
